SUMMARY

I lead growth for Swappie in the Benelux and architected the global GTM strategy for the iPad category. My focus is market share, not awareness. I transformed the Benelux from secondary territories into the company's primary revenue engines. The result: 150% YoY revenue growth and #1 market leadership. I treat brand as a financial asset, building trust-based infrastructure that reduces customer acquisition costs while scaling volume. Beyond the Benelux, I lead global category expansions and collaborate on international launch teams for new product lines, building frameworks that work across borders.

STRATEGIC VICTORIES

Architecting the #1 Benelux Market Leader

MARKET DOMINANCE

The Challenge: The business had "presence" but zero penetration. We had an active website but no localization in marketing or CX. Refurbished tech was a low-trust concept → we weren't just selling iPhones, we were fighting a credibility gap in a very skeptical market.

The System: I stopped chasing "awareness" and fixed the friction first. I localized the entire value chain, from replacing generic credit card options with local payment parity (iDEAL/Bancontact) and fixing shipping logistics to meet regional expectations. Once the machine converted, I poured gas on it: high-impact OOH/TV for authority, PR and Influencers for trust, and a localized performance layer to dominate the category.

The Result: We didn't just grow; we took over. We secured #1 Market Leader status after 1 year, with 150% YoY revenue growth. This made the Benelux the only region to capture market share and hit profitability during a company-wide global stagnation.

Driving Scale During a 40% Budget Reduction

OPERATIONAL EFFICIENCY

The Challenge: We were hit with aggressive corporate budget cuts, but the growth targets didn't move. The "easy" way out was to scale back and let volume drop, but I challenged this and took the harder path to maintain velocity with 40% less capital.

The System: I stopped using performance spend to mask operational gaps and audited high-leverage costs instead. I renegotiated shipping and payment processing terms to reclaim margin and utilized enterprise media-buying expertise to secure high-yield OOH/TV deals that outperformed previous benchmarks. By fixing the leaky bucket and boosting conversion rates by 1.5% through a different set of optimizations, we forced every remaining dollar to work twice as hard.

The Result: We maintained baseline order levels despite a 40% reduction in marketing spend. We didn't just "survive" the cuts but proved that a brand-first strategy supported by operational efficiency delivers a higher ROI than raw performance spend ever could.

Architecting the Multi-Category GTM Engine

SCALABILITY & EXPANSION

The Challenge: We were a single-product business (iPhones) needing to transition into a multi-vertical consumer electronics leader. Our mission is to make Refurbished Mainstream, and to do this, we need to offer more than 1 vertical. The risk was diluting the brand or failing to replicate the iPhone success in categories where we had zero authority.

The System: I built the organization's first cross-functional GTM playbook. I established repeatable frameworks for audience segmentation, positioning, and cross-silo execution that removed the guesswork from new category entries. By treating the iPad launch as a high-stakes stress test for this framework, we identified the exact levers needed to move non-iPhone inventory.

The Result: The iPad launch was a successful proof-of-concept that became the blueprint for four concurrent global category launches (Airpods, MacBooks, Smartwatches, and non-iPhone Smartphones). We are now successfully evolving from a niche specialist into a comprehensive electronics destination without losing operational focus.
